The Race to Protect Our Most Important Natural Resource: Water, is an investigative view into the most pressing threats against modern society's most precious natural resource; water; and how to mitigate them. This book is NOT about taking shorter showers, and it is NOT about selling you on water filters. It is about knowing the current score related to the very essence of life, and helping you become more aware how you can make a positive impact. The Race to Protect Our Most Important Natural Resource: Water, examines the current geo-political public policies which were designed to help conserve and protect our very limited clean drinking water sources, and what government, community activists, and advocates are doing about the problem of dwindling clean fresh water supplies which humans rely on to sustain life. This book reviews historic series of events, that act as lessons learned by former civilizations and communities, as examples of what can occur when we do not approach the subject of protecting and preserving clean drinking water for generations ahead. The Race to Protect Our Most Important Natural Resource: Water, provides perspectives from a number of data and reports on what is happening to our clean drinking water supplies, and why it is absolutely critical that we take action now, before time and water runs out. This book shares detailed accounts of economic disasters, and the fall of most recent communities and trade as a result of mismanages and misused clean drinking water supplies; as these reports serve as a warning sign of things to come in the not so distant future. Francis Okelo, Former Ambassador and United Nations Special Envoy, shares his thoughts about The Race to Protect...
