CHAPTER I A GOOD START The long procession wound, snake-like, down York Street to the strains of a barbaric incantation. Dancing torches at the head shot far shadows through the overarching elms as the rows of men, with arms outstretched and locked together, swung aimlessly from curb to curb, now moving at a walk, then, as the music quickened, breaking into a run. The column, in its uncertain swaying, turned to the right, passed the Gymnasium, and entered High Street. Once across Wall, it suddenly straightened and, veering sharply to the left, swept over a vacant field. The advance-guard of three hundred men with torches stopped in the center, then pressed slowly outward, the circle, as it expanded, forcing back the dense crowd in its scramble for a view of the cleared space within. A chubbily built fellow breasted his way through a knot of men in the ring, and clapped his hand on another's shoulder. Where, whered you drop from Jack Arnold, slouch-hatted and-with coat turned inside out from respect for dripping kerosene, whirled round with a shout. Billy! Billy Thompson! he laughed, gleefully, wringing the outstretched hand. Its great to be back, isnt it, Billy We seniors own the earth now, and it doesnt seem three years since we were on the outside of the mob back there. Another year and well be more outside still! A soberness came with the words, but lasted only a moment. Few things could make Thompson unhappy...
